This makes an absorbing read leaving the reader with much to ponder, With great sensitivity and skill, the author tells of handicapped Shona's life on her remote Scottish island, capturing her further isolation because she's trapped inside her own palsied body, unable to speak intelligibly. Carl, the new Laird's son, arrives and gradually he breaks down her barriers, practically in terms of her handicap and emotionally in terms of her approaching womanhood. I ended up a bit limp and soggy at the end so it must've been a good read!
